

Functions improve code efficiency by promoting reusability, modularity, and readability. Instead of writing the same code multiple times, functions allow us to define a block of reusable code that can be called whenever needed, reducing redundancy. They also make debugging and maintaining code easier, as each function can be tested and updated independently. Additionally, functions enhance organization by breaking complex tasks into smaller, manageable parts, improving overall program structure and execution efficiency.